

File 20090108.2106: The difference between programming and software engineering: programmers are trained to follow specifications precisely—that is why they often implement what the user asked for a little too literally. Software engineers are trained a little differently: to elicit clear requirements from the user so that the programme implements what the user really needs, not necessarily what he asked for.

References